The purpose of this reading is to assess specific tales in The Thousand and One Nights in the context of the Arabic first sections argue the marginalization of such tales in mainstream criticism, the rest concentrates on the fluctuating reasons behind the expressed fears of the guardians of religion and morality, and the suspicions that were behind narrative. Only two tales are chosen to demonstrate the popular components in the collection, not only because they are between an accepted narrative that was admired and collected by the literati in certain periods, but mainly because of their properties, as usually argued in current criticism of popular culture.
