Abstract

Accounting featured prominently in the everyday life and culture of the middle class family in Britain during the nineteenth century. The increasing implementation of accounting techniques in the bourgeois home is considered here in the context of the rationalisation of the household, the threat of insolvency, the prevailing ideology of domesticity, the employment of domestic labour and contemporary systems of household purchasing. It is shown that domestic accounting systems were founded on stewardship and hierarchical accountability and thereby contributed to the operation of masculine domination in the middle class family. Accounting was an instrument for restraining female consumption and containing women in domestic roles. Although women were prescribed accounting functions in the “invisible” private domain they were excluded from the “public” occupation of accountant in Victorian Britain.

Many constructive comments were received during presentations at the School of Business and Economic Studies, University of Leeds; Cardiff Business School and the School of Management and Finance, University of Nottingham. Josephine Maltby provided insightful observations on an earlier draft. Thanks also to colleagues in the Departments of Economic and Social History and Accounting and Business Method at Edinburgh University for their encouragement. I am particularly grateful to the anonymous referees whose suggestions substantially improved the paper.
