Arthur Hugh Clough in 1992, Alan Hill observed that 'it is surely one of the greatest sources of interest that even the most cryptic of references [in Clough's diary] can often be related to some of the central issues of his time'.¹ Two substantial new biographical studies by Anthony Kenny and Gillian Sutherland amply bear this out. They reveal that it is true not only of Arthur Hugh (1819–61), but also of his sister, Anne Jemima (1820–92), promoter of women's education and co-founder of Newnham College, Cambridge, and of his daughter Blanche Athena (1861–1960) vice-principal and principal of Newnham College. The Cloughs were connected through family ties, friendship, and shared interests to an...
