Abstract: One of the many fields that constitute "the third estate" as a historical category of writing. We know the rebels of England's 1381 rising through chronicles, court records, charters, poems, and so on. Yet the rebels remain outside representation in the written record. They do not represent themselves for the written record. They are reimagined by those who write. Maintaining a largely oral culture alongside an increasingly literate higher culture, England's lower strata appear in written records as incoherent and irrational creatures or as models of submission and faith, variously constructed by various writers' positions and preoccupations. The distortion of records does not render them useless. Historians have striven to recover the rebels' actions and motives by reconciling chronicle accounts against one another, searching court rolls for proceedings either brought on behalf of villeins against lords, interrogating the records of perhaps spurious accusations and confessions subsequent to the revolt, and recognizing other ways that all histories are interpretive and incomplete accounts. From my partial position—partial, that is, in being both disposed toward literary analysis and limited by a professional training in literature—I would like to examine the written absences that historians work to overcome and to propose that absence is an important feature of the rebels' cultural status.
