Pakiwaitara - social work sense for supervision

Jacquelyn Elkington

Abstract

Pakiwaitara (Elkington, 2001) came about as a gap identified in social service delivery between western, middle class, dominant culture and the healing of M ori wh nau in crisis. While education has responded to this gap by offering bicultural training, ensuring more M ori components within degree programmes, etc, social services statistics are still high for M ori and indigenous peoples. It has helped to shift the definition of cultural supervision to inside the definition of specialised professional supervision (Elkington, 2014), but now continued invisibility of values and beliefs, particularly that of Tau iwi, exacerbate the problem. The challenge must still be asserted so that same-culture practitioners are strengthened in same-culture social work practice (eg, by M ori, for M ori), and to avoid when possible, or otherwise by choice, white dominant-culture practice, for all-and-every-culture social work practice (eg, by P keh , for everyone).
