Abstract

Marching band programs and philosophies have changed early part of the 1960s. The advent of contemporary marching band (techniques/styles) has had a profound influence on the development, participation, and growth of marching band programs throughout the American culture. The marching band continues to evolve into an art form of the American culture. The purpose of this study was to determine organizational structures, marching concepts employed, and auxiliary units, the activities of the ten Southeastern Conference marching band programs for the 1981 season. A questionnaire was administered to the directors of the ten Southeastern Conference marching band programs for the 1981 season. A questionnaire was administered to the directors of the ten Southeastern Conference marching band programs for the 1981 season.

the ten marching band directors of the SEC. All ten responded to questionnaires for the study. Items included in the questionnaire designed to provide information in several categories: (1) Band size, (2) Graduate assistants, (3) Student staff, (4) Other positions, (5) Season, (6) Marching techniques—fundamentals of drill, (7) Shows instituted, (8) Show charting, (9) One-week shows, (10) Historical records, (11) Auxiliary units, (12) Grading, service awards, and school games, (13) Band histories, and (14) Free response. In addition, directors were requested to provide musical arrangements, charts, and photographs. Among the major findings of the study, the marching band programs are highly complex organizations with up to 300 members. (2) While all ten SEC marching band programs have eight have the faculty position of associate/assistant marching band director. Seven SEC marching band programs have resident arrangers. Of the ten SEC marching bands, seven employ graduate assistants. Six respondents indicated the use of student staff. (6) The number of bandmembers ranged from 37 to 138. (7) Only one SEC marching band does not hold pre-season practice. (8) Stationary and motion marching drills were used for each of the SEC marching band programs. (9) Six respondents reported multiple drill (corps style) was the most representative style used in their programs while four respondents reported eclecticism (a variety of marching styles). (10) Four respondents indicated the existence of band histories at their university.
