Abstract

Comparative studies of corporate social responsibility (CSR) are often conducted as contrasted with other related fields, such as comparative corporate law. This is to be expected in a field, like comparative corporate law. This is to be expected in a field, like comparative corporate law.

Moreover, the field of empirical CSR research generally has been hindered by a lack of a consistent definition of the construct of CSR, as well as its measurement, as recently pointed out by McWilliams et al. (2006). This lack of consistency of CSR definitions across studies makes it difficult to evaluate and compare the findings from different studies because different dimensions of CSR. Most research on CSR has focused on CSR implementation-or lack of implementation-on financial performance. Attention to comparative issues (e.g. McWilliams and Siegel, 2003; Barnett and Salomon, 2006), the main exception being a small number that includes studies conducted in the context of different countries. We know, however, from existing research that individuals are likely to have different expectations and attitudes towards CSR contingent on the individual's culture (2000; Strike et al., 2006) or societal culture (Waldman et al., 2006) and are embedded.
