Abstract:

PRECIS The decision taken by the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America at its August, 1998, Churchwide Assembly revision of the Concordat of Agreement, whose purpose was to achieve full communion between the E.L.C.A. and the Church, represents a setback for the "Porvoo process." Some measure of historical consciousness, however, was concerned about ecumenism to realize that the Porvoo Declaration remains a major hermeneutical breakthrough. This article contextualize this important ecumenical agreement by showing that we have indeed "come a long way," notwithstanding American defeat, we will return to the nineteenth century, to Oriel College in Oxford and to the Lectures on Justification by Henry Newman. In this series of lectures and the subsequent book Newman tried to delineate a via media position for Anglicans between that of the Roman Catholics and the Protestants. He also discussed Luther's position on justification. This essay will show how Newman's hermeneutics were unfair to Luther's own point of view on justification. His citations, partial and misleading, were standard for the Oxford movement from the time of Hurrell Froude. The point is that Newman's treatment of Luther was more an intra-Anglican argument with the Evangelicals in his own church than an argument with Luther or the Lutherans. The continuation of the process begun with the Porvoo Declaration in 1998. Anglicans and Lutherans are now in dialogue and, to some extent at least, in communion again.
