Abstract

A growing number of environmental movements recognize the need for changing our spiritual approach to the environment, while we simultaneously witness a revival and development of ecotheologies and religiously motivated environmental initiatives. Islamic theological discourse on ecological issues is quite well studied, but less attention has been directed to how Islamic ecology has been translated into activism and practical ecology.

Which Islamic beliefs and practices do Muslim environmental activists view as important in their work for the advancement of sustainable agriculture and permaculture? Based on interviews with seven Muslims involved in either agroecology or permaculture this study looks into religious beliefs motivating... \(More\)
