Abstract

This study attempts to assess the impact of municipal internationalism for cities and towns involved in more comprehensive types of global interchange. Focusing on two Canadian-sponsored linkages “ involving the cities of Lethbridge (Alberta) and Ica (Peru), and Toronto (Ontario) and São Paulo (Brazil), respectively “ the study supports the findings of earlier research which reveals that intensive municipal exchange can pay real dividends to the participants involved. At the same time, however, closer examination of exchange dynamics in each case shows that the process can also produce certain unintended “ and negative “ consequences not previously identified in the literature. These, in turn, appear to affect not only the quality of specific projects, but the continued vitality of the exchange process itself “ thus limiting the overall benefits of the phenomenon.
