Abstract

Hidden away in the recesses of basement archives in the Aus are intriguing textile examples of the permeability of border and the real that show how fact and fiction intersect and even myths by which we come to understand ourselves and other: discoveries amongst the First Nations' collection was a pair of sheepskin moccasins described as Minnehaha's Moccasins [Fi myself, whose lives are fired by literary imagination, Minnehaha fascinating example of cultural negotiation and translation - b materiality and the story that accompanies their long and unl northern to southern hemispheres. Made by indigenous pec Brunswick area (Mi'kmaq and Maliseet), the moccasins' mater indicative of cultural adaptation: made from sheepskin rather embroidered in glass bead rather than shell-bead or porcupine rather than traditional indigenous iconography. As material objects, Moccasins are a perfect example of the 'fabrics of change'; the form of museum correspondence and documentation is a 'trading identities'.
