Until recently, the most common books on the European witch-hunt have been either one country studies or general surveys of the field. There were at least five of the latter in the 1980s, of which the best (by Brian Levack) has recently gone into a second edition. But as the subject matures, we are now getting a wider variety of types of study; here are two examples. The first, by the anthropologist Andrew Saunders, A Deed without a Name. The Witch in Society and History (Oxford/Washington, DC: Berg, 1995; pp.xi + 232. Pb. [pounds]14.95), returns to a theme that was particularly fruitful in the 1960s and 1970s: the links between history and anthropology, and between the witchcraft of early modern Europe and of modern tribal societies. Dr Saunders writes with the general reader also in mind, and has a contemporary message: we may not hunt witches today, but we attach pejorative labels to marginal people in the same way- a way that amounts to persecution. His approach is thematic and at first sight decidedly unhistorical. Case-studies from various twentieth-century tribal peoples (mainly African and native American) are mixed with a sprinkling of examples from early modern Europe to illustrate the processes of detecting and labelling witches. Those most at risk are not people with rivals, but people whose...
