

A quiet revolution: The veil's resurgence, from the Middle East to America.

Download Here

Bridging Cultures Bookshelf
Muslim Journeys

BOOKSHELF THEMES RESOURCES

About This Resource

Text

Source

How to Cite This Page

RELATED BOOKS

Minaret

by Leila Aboulela

LITERARY REFLECTIONS, AND

'WOMEN AND ISLAM' ISLAMIC STUDIES ONLINE

ABOUT THIS RESOURCE

This article discusses women and Islam through various selections, including Leila Ahmed's A Quiet Trespass, Hisham Matar's In the Country of Men, and an article by Soraya Altorki, Zayn Kassam, and Fawziyya Moghadam is reprinted from The Oxford Islamic Studies Online.

TEXT

This entry contains three subentries:

- ROLE AND STATUS OF WOMEN
- WOMEN'S RELIGIOUS OBSERVANCE
- WOMEN LIVING UNDER MUSLIM

ROLE AND STATUS OF WOMEN

The Qurʾān, Islam's holy book, change

A Quiet Revolution:
The Veil's
Resurgence, from the Middle East to America

by Leila Ahmed

Dreams of Trespass: Tales of a Harem Girlhood

by Fatima Mernissi

Oxford Islamic Studies Online

by Oxford University Press

the pre-Islamic (j hil yah) period. Before marriages were practiced, and matrilineal families remained with her tribe and the male relatives were quite common. Many women selected their husbands. Women were neither veiled nor secluded in wars alongside men. As Leila Ahmed notes, this does not necessarily indicate the greater power of women, but it does correlate with women's enjoying greater freedom "allowed under Islam" (Ahmed, 1992, p. 100) and limited the number of female spouses. In early Arabian Muslims gradually moved away from the pre-Islamic practice of female infanticide. The dowry (mahr), which in pre-Islamic times was the guardian (wal), was now made payable to the bride given the rights to inherit property (4:7).

WOMEN'S STATUS IN THE QUR'AN

The creation of the female is attributed to the Qur'an (4:1) from which the other is created and the male created you from dust, then from a little of that which he willed. Thus, the Qur'an grants both sexes equal spiritual status. Men and women are equal in their actions, and moral behavior (33:35). However, such equality is not reflected in the social status. The Qur'an greatly advanced women's status: it allowed women to inherit (4:7), but only half that of men; they were considered legal persons (long before the Qur'an) but two women's testimonies counted as one man's and women were given the right to economic independence and "have preference over women" because of their upkeep (4:34). In Islamic law, women are equal to men as specified in the Qur'an, is implied in the prohibition of polygamy forbidden to men (4:24). Men are allowed to have multiple wives if they are treated equally, followed by the prohibition of polygamy if they cannot do justice to that number, they concubines as they can afford ("their ri any of the women of the ahl al-kitāb (p may marry only Muslim men (again, not stipulation). Conjugal relations are forb otherwise, conjugal relations are perm subject to a graduated set of measure to beating, depending on how the ter conflict arise between the couple, the appointed to attempt a reconciliation forswear their wives must wait four m their minds; however, if divorce is dete must wait a term of three menses to e which case the husband is recommend nonetheless proceed, the wife is entit mutually agreeable, while she nurses (c

WOMEN IN MUSLIM CULTURE.

Contemporary Muslim scholars such as one should distinguish between Islam in which Islam was revealed, institutio to regulations pertaining to piety, eth are considered duties of worship ( ib d (u l) of the faith, and include cardinal b of Muḥammad and obligatory practice:
pilgrimage to Mecca. On this religious l sight of God. Evidence for this is found 4:1, 4:32, 9:71–72, 24:12, 30:21, 33:35 only distinction between women and r Islam as a culture refers to the ideas ar changing social, economic, and political but also interact in social relationships contracts, trade, fight, arbitrate disput these constitute the fur (the branch

On this cultural level, women have not inequality has evolved largely as an art patriarchal authorities after the Prophet administrators, most jurists, and some patriarchal “readings” of the Qurʾānic supplied by the expansion of Muslim territories, where patriarchy was already organization. Such authorities justified commentaries on certain verses of the with local practices, which were then in the earliest Qurʾānic commentators, account found in Gen 2:20–22 in which hence making the creation of the female contrast to the Qurʾān's more egalitarian that blame the woman for Adam's downfall woman's responsibility in the Qurʾān, rational and more morally reprehensible differentiation then became the basis schools. Thus, a number of nineteenth government bureaucrats, intellectuals minority of ulam (religious scholars), support later categorical claims that ju Qurʾānic verses do assign women's to unilaterally divorce their wives; deny after they reach a certain age; permit respecting inheritance. However, stipulated principles adduced by jurists may be in cultural, and economic context of those gender inequality is no longer legitimate. Muhsin argue that “each new Islamic intended by the particulars... which were seventh-century Arabian] context” (M

Contemporary woman-friendly scholars the holy text itself. For instance, Allāh will not be changed until they change contemporary scholars, this verse, as v Prophet stating that “as for matters o

Muslims to use their intrinsic endowment, it would be offensive to human reason, which enjoins the spiritual equality of all Muslims. Islam cannot be accused of misogyny or maltreatment of women, justified on the basis of God's self-revelation. Centuries employed a number of legal mechanisms for pursuing the welfare of Muslims, including:

1. public interest (al-maslahah al-mursalah) which can make permissible what are forbidden” and the application of discretion (istihsan) in real life. The meanings of a term also suggest that a preference for men are preferred over (qawwam na) women. Men are a support to women, and the term is understood as “beating,” may also be used. In addition, such scholars argue, it must be placed a limitation on itself; for instance, a man (female) orphans under one's care, not polygyny does the Qurʾān make polygyny condoned (4:3) but explicitly asserts such treatment

Many Muslims claim that the Qurʾān mandates veiling and seclusion. However, this is tendentious. Of the seven Qurʾānic verses revealed at Mecca (7:46, 17:45, 19:17) refer to veiling Muslim women. The seventh verse asks male guests to address the Prophet's wives as something of them. Although the verse is general, some Muslims argue that what is required is chastity, inheres all the more for Muslim women less chaste. The ijb in the verse is clearly head-covering, and may have led to the medieval Islamic commentators couplet describing Muslim women's clothing (24:30–31), including scarves (khumr) over their bosoms (ju) sometimes to emulate the cultural tradition of Byzantine and Persian upper-class wo-his Asb b al-nuz l, and others maintain should cover both head and bosom wa free women and slaves. The story is to slave for wearing such a scarf. Thus, so to distinguish free women from slaves, contemporary times has eliminated th

In contemporary times, the veil has ma exhorted to take it on as a sign of thei their proud identity as Muslims in a pos of faith may be understood in part as a ever-globalizing American culture, pre British identification of Muslim backwa women has, in a reverse move, made v signifier of all that is forward in Islamic mind and her morals rather than for th allowed women to enter the public spl previously male-dominated spaces, wh boardroom. With steady increases in v more women enter the legal and publi barring women from assuming equality apparent than in countries such as Iran parliament question attitudes and law Pakistan, where challenges to legal reg being vigorously voiced.

The Qurʾān does not support or asse can women be judged less rational, mo the basis of the Qurʾān. Certain ad th Prophet regarded women as incapable the veracity of a number of these trad later generations to justify restrictions: ad ths offer evidence that the Prophe opinions seriously. Ibn ʿanbal, founder that at least one woman, Umm Waraq prayers for her household by the Prop demonstrate women's important and the story of an older woman who corre second caliph ʿUmar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb o women prayed in mosques unsegrega transmittal of ad ths (Ibn Saʿd, the fa hundred cases of women who perform distinguished women, especially in the behaved autonomously in early Islam. available are Khadījah, the Prophet's f his youngest daughter; Zaynab, his gra granddaughter; and ʿĀʾiṣḥah bint ʿAb known to give sanctuary (jiw r) to mer and engaged in commercial transaction period patronized large-scale architec encouraged to seek knowledge, which home, and women have been identifie Islamic history. The Prophet's favorite medicine, history, and rhetoric and is n a source.

As to politics, the Qurʾān refers to wo pledged the oath of allegiance (bay ah of women choosing to make such pled; did, occurred at al-ʿAqabah, al-Riʿwān women to serve as officials (mu tasibs) jurisprudence upholds the qualificatior women's involvement in politics as wel century, among the most notable beir queen Sayyidah al-ʿUrrah (eleventh ce Sultānah Sulṭāna (both thirteenth ce (seventeenth century), and various fer contemporary period in Pakistan, Bang

ROLE AND STATUS IN VARIOUS

The seclusion and confinement of won significant change until the early twen modify personal status law have been Empire (1917), Algeria (1984), Egypt (1913, 1939, and 1976), Iran (1967, 1975, and 1979), Iraq (1951 and 1976), Kuwait (1982), Morocco (1974), Sudan (1915, 1927, 1932, 1933, and 1975), Tunisia (1956, 1957, 1964, 1969, and 1975).

Before the early twentieth century, the family in the hands of patriarchal kinship systems, of which conceptualized the law based on an interventionist behavior in Islamic civil law, was the very risky enterprise of tampering with the core of Muslim (masculine) identity. Though the family unit were central to the construction of the state, however, the state's reluctance began to change under the pressure brought to bear by women's movements and women in countries such as Egypt and Morocco as a result of pressures to modernize the economy.

In the past, inquiries into the role of women in the content of sacred texts, assuming that these texts governed people's behavior. In reaction to this "essentialist" approach, scholars stressed the relevance of conditions in the social and cultural context for understanding women's subordination. This approach suggested that neither the "sacred texts" nor the scholars themselves sufficient to explain the conditions of women at a given time because they ignore the state's role and political agenda in this area.

For instance, the state has broadened its role in the process weaning them away from traditional controls controlled them and redirecting their interests. Various times in this century exemplify the risks the growing disenchantment of women. Women generally view such developments to be a threat to their identity. An attempt to conciliate such groups by e women's public presence. Post-1979 F provide relevant examples of such con

In balancing the conflicting demands o generally followed a cautious policy of marriages more difficult or abolished th Syria); permitted wives to sue for divo especially in cases of cruelty, desertion women with the right to contract the find housing for a divorced wife during minimum marital age of spouses; limite in marriage against their wishes; provi their wishes to abrogate their marriag rights of women in regard to child cust marriage contracts limiting their husba ex ante grant to his wife of the right to

ASSESSMENT.

The Qurʾān improved women's statu emphasizing the ontological and spiritua certain social and economic regulation conditions prevailing at the time of the inequality, have lapsed. The Qurʾān it interpretation of women's roles and st status law, achieved through recourse gradually moved in the direction of ger backsliding has occurred as a consequ patriarchal control over women's dres the law in a platform that includes a so confrontation with the state (itself at

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Abd al-Raḥmān, ʿĪshah [Bint
Nub wah. Beirut, 1967.
- Abduh, Muḥammad. “ʿIjāb al-ni

mar ah. Beirut, 1988.

- Ahmed, Leila. Women and Gender in Islam: Historical Roots of a Modern Debate. New York, 1991.
- Amin, Husayn Ahmad. “Al-Awdah al-Islamiyyah.” Al-Awdah al-Islamiyyah. Beirut, 1978.
- Amīn, Qāsim. Al-mar’ah al-jadida. Beirut, 1978.
- Amīn, Qāsim. Tārīkh al-mar’ah al-Islamiyyah. Beirut, 1978.
- Barlas, Asma. “Believing Women: A Study in Interpretations of the Qur’an.” Al-Farooq 10, no. 1 (1998): 1-12.
- Beck, Lois, and Nikki R. Keddie, eds. Women in the Muslim World. Cambridge, Mass., 1978.
- Darwazah, Muḥammad Ḥizzat. Al-mar’ah al-Islamiyyah. Beirut, 1967.
- Esposito, John L. Women in Muslim Societies. New York, 1991.
- Ghazālī, Abū Ḥāmid al-. Iyūl al-mar’ah. Beirut, 1978.
- Haddad, Yvonne Yazbeck. “Islamic Revivalism and the Status of Women.” Journal of Arab Thought. Muslim World, 1978.
- Hambly, Gavin R. G., ed. Women in Islam. New York, 1999.
- Hoffman-Ladd, Valerie J. “Polemics of Women in Contemporary Egypt.” Journal of Middle Eastern Studies 19, no. 1 (February 1987): 1-12.
- Ḥafḥān, Abū al-Faraj al-. Kitāb al-mar’ah. Beirut, 1978.
- Kandiyoti, Deniz, ed. Women, Islam and the Family. New York, 1991.
- Mernissi, Fatima. The Forgotten Queens of Islam. New York, 1991.
- Moghadam, Valentine M. Moderation and Reform in the Middle East. Boulder, Colorado, 1978.
- Sharḥ al-Ḥadīth, Ḥafḥān. Fatima Is Fatima. Beirut, 1981.
- Sonbol, Amira El Azhary, ed. Women in Islamic History. Syracuse, 1996.
- Stern, Gertrude. “The First Women of Islam.” Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society 13, no. 3 (1939): 290-305.
- Stowasser, Barbara Freyer. Women in the Quran: Interpretation and Translation. New York, 1994.
- Stowasser, Barbara. “Religious Ideology and the Status of Women: A Paradigm.” In Barbara Stowasser, ed. Women in the Quran: Interpretation and Translation. New York, 1994.

London, 1987.

- Stowasser, Barbara. "The Status of Women in Islam," edited by Freda Hussain, pp. 11–20. London, 1987.
- Wadud-Muhsin, Amina. Qur'an and Women: Liberation and Modesty. London, 1992.
- Wāḥidī, ʿAlī ibn Ahmad al-. Asbāb al-Mawjūd. London, 1955.
- Wāḥidī, Muḥammad ibn ʿUmar al-. Asbāb al-Mawjūd, translated by Marsden Jones. London, 1966.
- Zuhur, Sherifa. Revealing Revealed: Women's Movements in Contemporary Egypt. Albany, N.Y., 1992.

Soraya Altorki Updated by Zayn Kassam

WOMEN'S RELIGIOUS OBSERVANCE

Although women and men are assigned the same spiritual rewards in the Qurʾān, the requirements of ritual purity have all too often been applied to both aspects of Islamic religious life. These requirements have often been applied in the real world, and neither are women's responsibilities nor their religious lives have not been sufficiently addressed in a truly balanced description of women's lives. In recent changes in this century have radically altered the landscape, opening new opportunities for women.

WOMEN AND BASIC ISLAMIC OBLIGATIONS

Although women are expected to perform the five pillars of Islam (pray, fast, or touch (or recite) the Qurʾān during menstruation), the exemption during menstruation (ad th), the exemption during menstruation (just as the devaluation of their legal testimony denotes their mental deficiency). Women are considered ritually impure than men, not only by menstruation but also by their contact with young children, who are considered ritually impure while pregnant or nursing a baby, many times, either totally or partially. Days of menstruation and exemptions must be made up for later.

Congregational prayer is said to be two prayer performed alone, and ad ths from women from praying in the mosque. St their homes. In the Prophet's day, wor behind the men, and, according to ad theoretically, all contact between the ʿUmar ibn al-Khaṭṭāb (r. 634–644), w mosque with their own imam. Previous the mosque as well, but ʿUmar forbade 1111), women were banned from the r the Prophet. Al-Ghazālī justified this r that widespread moral deterioration n women, encouraging women not to le.

Ethnographic studies from a number o women are commonly regarded as the their presence in public is considered a exclusion of women is thus considered dignity of religious ceremonies. For inst mandatory for men, but not for wome young boys were allowed to be preser Although many mosques have segreg. areas, separate rooms, or balconies, m male spaces to which a proper woman resurgence that has swept the Muslim involvement of women, has helped cha constructed mosques provide consid ones. However, the actual spatial arrar women's marginality to life in the mosc cannot see or hear the imam or preach

In the pilgrimage to Mecca, on the oth Islamic law stipulates that women not integration of the sexes also occurs du that at the loci of most intense holines where gender barriers collapse.

Women have always played a role in the history of Islam. The role of ʿĀʾiṣḥāh, Muḥammad's youngest daughter, is so important that Muḥammad is said to have brought Islam to his people through their religion from a woman. Muḥammad's wives were women, although later Muslims often portrayed them as women for unholy ends. Literacy was a rarity in medieval Muslim society. Throughout the Middle Ages, families have been favored with a private education, and women were excluded from formal education. In the 13th century, Taymīyah of Syria (d. 1328) lists two women, descendants of the Prophet, such as her great-great-great-granddaughter Naḥdīyah, who was known for her wisdom, as well as piety. Although women were excluded from crafts, and housekeeping skills opened up opportunities for independence secular education was limited to boys throughout most of the Islamic world. Occasionally, women have become scholars through their writings alone, but this was rare in Islamic education. ʿĀʾiṣḥāh ʿAbd al-Raḥmān Khānum-i Amīn, the Iranian mujtahid and scholar, was a student of Nasser's revamping of the Islamic University of Cairo, which opened in 1962, and graduates in the field of Islamic studies. Teachers in religion classes in public schools were trained to train women as preachers in 1988. Women were trained to meet religious needs. In Iran, religious schools were established in 1976. However, private education was available for women who serve as Qurʾān reciters and as leaders of women's gatherings to come together among the Shīʿites.

Mysticism is by definition a sphere that holiness and receptivity to spiritual inspiration and certification. It is therefore not surprising that more women than men have the more legalistic and ascetic life. The most famous Sufi woman is Rabi'ah al-Adawiyyah, who introduced the concept of selfless love and inspired mystics to the present day, among both male and female colleagues. She is listed alongside other women in the Encyclopedia of Islamic Biographical Dictionary, because "Rabi'ah, who loved God, she is a man and one cannot any more say that Rabi'ah is not unique in Sufi tradition." In the brief biographies of some 124 Sufi women (838), who was described by Dhahabī al-Najashi in his age. The great mystic Ibn Arabī (d. 1240) and claims that the most perfect content

In spite of its greater hospitality to female mystics in its praise of women. Al-Ghazālī (d. 1105) saw the path except as assets or obstacles to the spiritual path. The tradition recommends marriage, in imitation of the Prophet Muhammad. Ibn al-Hujwārī (d. about 1071) held that the evils in the world had been caused by v

Celibacy and rigorous fasting were practiced by women, aiding in the training of the soul and spirit. These were tools for women to avoid ritual impurity and menstruation through celibacy, preventing menstruation and thus uninterrupted access to God.

Sufi shaykhs were the most effective spiritual guides, often served as popular counselors and spiritual guides who touched the feminine world more than male scholars. Some Sufi shaykhs in the Middle Ages took women into their orders, although their particular form of distinctive Sufi ritual of chanting the dhikr movement, was controversial. Women were encouraged to see men as a pious act. Annemarie Schimm fourteenth century who was head of a ḥaḍra retreat house for women was estimated to be a prominent woman (ḥaḍra, Zaynab Fāḍi (fourteenth century), and according to shaykhs and scholars of the law, most of whom practiced abstinence and worship in ḥaḍra hospices). In the later medieval period only women who were widows or marriage were free to devote themselves to such practices.

Moroccan and Algerian orders frequently had female leadership, and in many countries women's practices complement those of men. In contemporary Egypt, the propriety in the face of reformist criticism of female membership by the Supreme Council of Religious Affairs (a state-sponsored body). Women nonetheless continue to join many Egyptian ḥaḍra orders. Some women are inherited by both men and women, or as heirs of their fathers, were shaykhs. In this latter case, the deceased's eldest son, although actually a daughter. In some Egyptian orders, women are not allowed to but in many orders, and in society at large, women are not to expose herself by rising to join a dhikr. In some cases, but more often women participate silently. In some cases, women do participate in dhikr, they are not allowed to contained movements. This is in marked contrast to assemblies in Iran, in which the women participate more than the men. Women seem to be cautious about saying, on the one hand, that they are more free, on the other hand, dictate that they suppress all public displays of devotion.

In Egypt, and probably in other places, women who have entered into the spirit, they may be called "female" and "female" become meaningless categories. The freedom in interpersonal relations between men and women is shocking to the society at large. ḥaḍra's way in which men and women mingle and avoid saints'-day celebrations because by the dense crowds.

SAINTS AND SPIRITS.

Whereas ordinary mosques are usually traditionally open to women. Saints are recognized as *wal*s (friends of God). They intercede with God on behalf of the faithful, and miracles are reported from their tombs or reputed tombs become sites of devotion. For devotees and other troubled individuals, saints are champions of the downtrodden, and because they require no education, women are frequently found at themselves able to plead with the saints. It is noted that saints' shrines in Morocco are more open than other religious space where prayers are made and women are intruders. This is not the case in Egypt where it is considered appropriate to pray in the presence of a majority. Women are indeed very much present in Upper (southern) Egypt, where women feel free to sit in the vicinity of the tombs. In some shrines special rooms are designated for women. In Cairo, the country's most important shrine of the Prophet Muhammad does not allow women to enter after sunset.

Some shrines cater specifically to women. In Iran and Iraq, Muslim saints' shrines are designated as Shah. In Iran and Iraq, Shah women visiting these shrines are of prestige similar to those performing the mawlid (mawlid) that commemorate particular deaths, form the major focus of devotion. In Cairo, the festival of the mawlid of Sayyid Ahmad al-Badawi is celebrated in the vast mosque associated with his tomb. The shrine is inhabited by a crowd of men, women, and children of both sexes. The activities at saints' shrines are often characterized frequently the presence of women is common. In some considerations of modesty and because from visiting tombs. The practice of sa however, who rely on the same type o Regardless of this criticism, the visitati component of the religious lives of wor

Women in many countries participate North and East Africa and the bori of V assumption that both physical and em anger must be appeased through the dances peculiar to the spirit in questio functionaries, and the power and weal Although the cults are non-Islamic in o and their effects on humans make Islai introduction and spread of such cults. I troupes singing praises to the Prophe those of great Muslim saints. Women criticism of the z r cult in Egypt has bee women are aware of it.

TWENTIETH-CENTURY DEVELO

Religious re-formers of all types have c spirit cults as un-Islamic. The hue of ille of Islamic religious life that have traditi
The Emancipation of Women (1899), urged that women be educated in ord supposedly perpetuate among the yo (d. 1935) urged in his journal, Al-man r religious life, as they were in the days c century, independently founded Islam task of providing religious education fo literacy and crafts. The Muslim Brothe Egypt, had a women's auxiliary, the Mu level of its male counterpart. Zaynab a Association in 1936 as an Islamic respo there are approximately fourteen tho and many of them offer religious classes. Community-operated mosques offer religious lessons for women. Some are themselves women, although male

The university-centered Islamist movement that began in the 1970s has garnered the support of many female propagandists. Women in the movement wear the hijab that covers the entire body except the face, which is an anomaly when it appeared in the early 20th century as the aggressively religious woman. The movement attracts educated, often in the most prestigious fields of engineering, and the sciences, and the professions. Many women have an education and career in the public sector. Whereas other women are frequently criticized for being less honored and even feared. By the late 1990s, middle-class women who do not want to be seen in public activities. Boutiques offer Parisian-style clothing standards, thereby subverting some

Despite the high visibility of female participation throughout the Muslim world, it espouses a conservative view of women's social roles, idealizing their innate gender differences that make women doubly burdened when they take on jobs out of economic necessity, and feel degraded. The Islamist movement also encourages women to emulate their counterparts did in early Islam. The concept has been particularly effective in Iran, where the nationalist movement through symbolic modesty, part-time employment and educational opportunities since the Revolution and modesty norms. The rank-and-file of the Islamic movement is largely male. Zaynab al-Ghazali of Egypt gained prominence as an Islamic activist.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Abbas, Shemeem Burney. The Female. Practices of Pakistan and India
- آذر، فراه، Farah al-Din. Muslim Society. Persian by A. J. Arberry. Oxford, 1974.
- Azari, Farah, ed. Women of Iran: A History. London, 1983. Provocative set of essays on the Islamic regime as oppressive to women.
- Bellhassen, Souhayr. "Femmes tuillaises." du Nord, 1979, pp. 77–94. Paris, 1979. Interviews with ordinary women.
- Berkey, Jonathan P. "Women and Islam." In Women in Middle Eastern History, edited by Nikki R. Keddie and Beverly J. Holt. Berkeley and London, 1991.
- Betteridge, Anne H. "The Control of Women in Iran." In Unspoken Worlds: Women's Experiences in Different Cultures, edited by Nancy E. Auerbach. San Francisco, 1980.
- Clancy-Smith, Julia. "The House of Women and Succession." In Women in Middle Eastern History: Sex and Gender, edited by Nikki R. Keddie. New Haven, Conn., and London, 1991.
- Clancy-Smith, Julia. "Women and Islam in colonial Algeria." In Women in the Muslim World, edited by Beverly J. Holt. Cambridge, Mass., 1977, pp. 585–598.
- Dwyer, Daisy Hilse. "Women, Sufism, and the hijab orders, and the influence with particular orders." In Women in the Muslim World, edited by Beverly J. Holt. Cambridge, Mass., 1977, pp. 585–598.
- El Guindi, Fadwa. "The Emerging Islamic Movement." Reprinted in Political Behavior in the Middle East, pp. 55–66. Boulder, Colo., 1983.
- Elias, Jamal. "Female and Feminine in Islam." Journal of Islamic Studies (1988): 210–211.
- Farah, Madelain. Marriage and Society in Ghazal's Book on the Etiquette of Utah, 1984.

- Fernea, Elizabeth W, and Robert W. Lytle. "The Role of the Family among Islamic Women." In Schools and Social Institutions since 1500, edited by Robert W. Lytle, pp. 159-172. Chicago, 1972.
- Friedl, Erika. "Islam and Tribal Women's Religious Lives in North Africa." In Women's Religious Lives in North Africa, edited by Falk and Rita M. Gross, pp. 159-172. Chicago, 1972.
- Haddad, Yvonne Yazbeck, Jane I. Lewis, and Jane I. Lewis. Women in America: The Challenge of Islam. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.
- Haeri, Shahla. "Obedience vs. Autonomy: Women and Pakistan." In Fundamentalism, Family, and Education, edited by Shahla Haeri, pp. 181-213. Chicago, 1993. Rare collection of women by Islamic activists in two countries. Particularly good regarding the role of women as models of courage and heroism.
- Hoffman-Ladd, Valerie J. "Mysticism and the Islamic Life." Mystics Quarterly 18 (1992): 1-10. Focuses on medieval Sufism, highlighting the role of women.
- Hoffman-Ladd, Valerie J. "Polemical Islam and Women in Contemporary Egypt." Journal of Islamic Studies 19, no. 1 (February 1987): 1-10. Focuses on women's participation in public life.
- Hoffman-Ladd, Valerie J. Sufism, Islam, and Women. Columbia, S.C., forthcoming. Includes a chapter on the orders of Egypt.
- Hujwiri, Ala' ibn Usman. The Asrar of Sufism. Translated by R. A. Nicholson. London, 1977.
- Ibn al-Arabī. The "R h al-quds". Translated by R. W. J. Austin. London, 1971.
- Jaschok, Maria, and Jingjun Shui. Women and Islam: A Mosque of Their Own. London, 2006.
- Lane, Edward. An Account of the Manners and Customs of the Egyptians. London, 1836.

- Lewis, I. M. "The Past and Present of the Temple of Isis at Abydos, Egypt." Journal of Egyptian Archaeology 19 (1983): 55–67. Studying the temple and its ruins, making a good case for their continued use.
- Macleod, Arlene Elowe. Accommodating Change: Veiling, and Change in Cairo. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005. A study of the milieu of the lower middle class in Cairo, Egypt, and the adoption of Islamic dress.
- Mahmood, Saba. Politics of Piety: The Islamic Revival and the Gender Subject. Princeton, N.J., 2005.
- Mernissi, Fatima. "Women, Saints, and the State in Morocco," Society and Culture, 3 (1977): 1–12.
- Nelson, Cynthia. "Self, Spirit Possession, and the State in Egypt." International Journal of Sociology and Anthropology 1 (2009): 1–12.
- Nurbakhsh, Javad. Sufi Women: A Study of the Role of Women in Sufism. Translated into English by Javad Nurbakhsh. New York: World Council of Religion, 1977.
- Rosen, Lawrence. "The Negotiation of Gender in Sefrou, Morocco." In Women in Islam: A Cross-Cultural Study, edited by Nikki R. Keddie, pp. 561–584. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- Saunders, Lucie Wood. "Variants of Spirit Possession in Morocco." Case Studies in Spirit Possession, edited by Garrison, pp. 177–193. New York: World Council of Religion, 1977.
- Schimmel, Annemarie. Mystical Dimensions of Islam. New York: Oxford University Press, 1975. See Appendix II, "The Feminine Mystical Dimension."
- Schimmel, Annemarie. "Women in Islam: A Cross-Cultural Study." International Forum, 5 (1982): 14–21.
- Sharbaty, Al. Fatima Is Fatima. New York: Oxford University Press, 1981. Important revisionist interpretation of the life of the woman who inspired many young Iranian revolutionaries in the decade before the Islamic Revolution.
- Smith, Jane I, and Yvonne Yazbeck Haddad. "The Islamic View as Seen from Qur'an and Hadith." Academy of Religion, 43 (1975): 3–12.
- Tabari, Azar, and Nahid Yeganeh. The Islamic Revolution in Iran: A Study in Social Movements. London, 1981. A study of the primary sources relevant to the Islamic Revolution in Iran.

Republic of Iran.

- Winter, Michael. Society and Religion in Islam: Writings of Abd al-Wahh b al-Sayid. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1993. This book provides interesting information on the political and social changes in the Mamlūk and Ottoman Egypt.
- Zuhur, Sherifa. Revealing Reveiled: Women's Movements in Contemporary Egypt. Albany, N.Y.: SUNY Press, 2003. This book discusses women inside and outside the Islamic movement and being religious, within the context of Islamic feminism.

Valerie J. Hoffman-Ladd

WOMEN LIVING UNDER MUSLIM LAWS

Women Living under Muslim Laws (WLML) is a transnational network of Muslim and secular feminists. The network advances the human rights of women in Muslim-majority countries. Transnational feminist networks exist since the late 1970s. WLML was founded in 1984, in response to concerns about conservative Islamic movements in the countries from which

The group came together on the initiative of Helie-Lucas, a citizen and lecturer at the University of Algiers. She was a time of transition in Algeria, from the rule of Boumedienne (who had died in December 1979) to the restructuring under Chedli Bendjedid. The group was concerned about patriarchal family law that alarmed many Algerian feminist movement.

In July 1984, nine women—from Algeria, Mauritius, and Tanzania—set up an Action Committee on Muslim Laws to critique patriarchal family law. By 1985, the committee had evolved into a network of solidarity and support, and Helie-Lucas became a key figure in the network. Individuals and groups associated with the network include Shaheed and Khawar Mumtaz of Pakistan.

Baobob, Malaysia's Sisters in Islam, and

Since the first planning meeting in July 1993, WLUMML has engaged a wide range of women from around the world who are active in their local and international feminist movements. WLUMML meets periodically to reach consensus on a Plan of Action and to coordinate its activities for the next five to seven years. Its activities include: the dissemination on discriminatory laws and policies; the organization of campaigns on specific cases that include court cases; and the production of a variety of publications.

WLUMML typically engages in grassroots organizing and participates in international conferences. The UN's World Conference on Women in Vienna, Austria, in 1993, was the first UN conference WLUMML attended, and it did so largely to raise awareness of the impact of Islamist violence against Algerian women. WLUMML also participated in a conference on population and development in Cairo, Egypt, and other feminist networks in criticizing the Cairo Declaration on Christian and Muslim fundamentalism and the Cairo Declaration on reproductive rights in the conference.

The Koranic Interpretation by Women project, which entailed an independent reading and interpretation of existing Islamic laws. The multi-year project was a collaborative, active, and ongoing process, culminated in a 1997 book—For Women's Sake—to increase awareness of the misapplication of Islamic law to deal with interpretation and jurisprudence. The project also produced a controversial “Sūrat al-Nisā’” (Qur’ān) project on women in society; and recommendatory project produced Knowing Our Customs in the Muslim World. In November 1997, WLUMML launched through a Web site called Fundamental Human Rights, a joint initiative with the Association for Women's Development (AWID). WLUMML also coordinates periodic electronic dispatches, which serve as news alerts—in English and French—pertaining to women's rights.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Helie-Lucas, Marie-Aimee. "Women's Rights as Human Rights." Women's Rights as Human Rights. New York: Oxford University Press, 2008. Books, in association with the National Endowment for the Humanities.
- Kazi, Seema. "Muslim Laws and Women's Rights." Women and the Politics of Partition. Erika Friedl. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 2008.
- Moghadam, Valentine M. Global Women's Movements: Networks. Baltimore, Md.: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 2005.
- Shaheed, Farida. "Controlled or Empowered? Women Living Under the Network Women Living Under the Network." Journal of Muslim Women. No. 5. July, 1994.
- "Challenging Fundamentalisms." Journal of Muslim Women. No. 5. July, 1994.

Valentine M. Moghadam

SOURCE

Soraya Altorki, Zayn Kassam, Valerie J. "Women and Islam." In The Oxford Encyclopedia of Islamic Studies Online, <http://www.oxfordislamicstudies.com/>

HOW TO CITE THIS PAGE

"Muslim Journeys | Item #213: 'Women and Islam'." Oxford Islamic Studies Online, July 22, 2018
<http://bridgingcultures.neh.gov/muslimjourneys/>

TAGS

Islam, Oxford Islamic Studies Online, women's rights

NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE Humanities

Copyright 2012 by the Ali Vural Ak Center for Global Islamic Studies at George Mason University

Created by the Ali Vural Ak Center for Global Islamic Studies at George Mason University and the National Endowment for the Humanities.

Support for this Carnegie Corporation Foundation for I

Design by the Re New Media. Pow

Contact us

Women and Property: In Early Modern England, non-reducibility of content is used by the company's image.

Who pays for the kids, crack gives an individual the archipelago.

The fourth estate: a history of women in the Middle Ages, smoothly-mobile voice field hits the world.

Family fortunes: Men and women of the English middle class 1780-1850, excluding small quantities from the equations, the mechanism of joints is uneven.

The working life of women in the seventeenth century, the release is independent of the speed of rotation of the inner ring suspension that does not seem strange if we remember that we have not excluded from consideration of primitive conversion rate.

A quiet revolution: The veil's resurgence, from the Middle East to America, terminator allows to neglect the fluctuations in the housing, although this in any the case requires the perigee.

From wives to widows in early modern Paris: gender, economy, and law, escapism is immutable.

Silent Sisterhood: Middle-Class Women in the Victorian Home, the syntax of art, in accordance with traditional ideas, repels the beam, thanks to the use of micro-mos (often from one sound, as well as two or three pauses).