Abstract : The dynamics of peasant society during a period of intense social change are examined. The general theme is that the patterns of socio-economic mobilization characteristic of peasant society in Russia led to important changes in the way of life. The differentiation and polarization processes touched on the political consciousness

Soviet peasantry. It is also argued that analysis of conflict relations between in rural areas points to a crucial division between the members of peasant and the rural representatives of the urban-orientated party and state apparatus overshadowed all other relationships. Finally, it shows the relationship between of socio-economic mobility and the conflict relations in rural society and indicates importance of these for explanations of the basic processes of Russian rural number of inferences relevant to the general analysis of peasants in contemporary society.
