

HTS Theological Studies

On-line version ISSN 2072-8050

Print version ISSN 0259-9422

Herv. teol. stud. vol.64 n.4 Pretoria Oct./Dec. 2008

BOEKBESPREKINGS / BOOK REVIEWS

Dunn, J D G 2007 - The new perspective on Paul

Publisher: Mohr Siebeck. Paperback, 536 pages. Price: Unknown

Reviewer: Dr M Cromhout (Johannesburg)

Now and again biblical scholarship and theology undergo what can be called a paradigm shift in interpretation. The "New Perspective on Paul" (NPP) certainly is such a paradigm shift. The "new perspective" is a term Dunn originally used for E P Sanders' work on Early Judaism and Paul, but it has since developed to now being mainly associated with the work of Dunn himself. Ever since the now famous Mansion Memorial Lecture delivered by Dunn in 1982, Pauline studies - at least in some circles - have challenged the received Protestant/Reformed tradition's interpretation of what Paul meant by "works of the law". The point of the enterprise was to understand that Paul's argument also had a social and ethnic dimension to it when appreciated context, and therefore should not exclusively be seen through the lens of Martin Luther's basic theology as it developed in reaction against Roman Catholicism. Employing social studies, Dunn opened up new understanding Paul, serving to enlighten those who welcome it, and soliciting vigorous opposition from those who fear that threat that will destroy the very foundation of the Protestant/Reformed theological tradition.

Dunn's basic thesis is that "works of the law" do not refer to "legalistic works righteousness", or to the one's salvation through "works". What Paul opposed, rather, was the insistence of Israelite believers in a social boundary between Israelite and Gentile. The "works of the law" - mainly circumcision, dietary laws, and Sabbath observance - which the Gentile believers had to adopt, were important "badges" of identity, or "test cases" of the covenant with God. As far as these Israelite believers were concerned, Gentiles had to become members of the covenant and so adopt "Jewish" identity through circumcision and/or observing purity laws and the Sabbath. Paul argued that to exercise their faith in Jesus by remaining Gentiles. It is the Gentile adoption of these "badges" of identity that Paul strongly opposed. He attacked the social function of the law, a certain attitude towards the law.

Services on Article

- English
- Article i
- Article 1
- How to
- Automat

Indicators

- Access :

Related link

Share

-
- More
- Permalink

served as a boundary marker between "Jew" and Gentile.

Dunn also insists, however, that "works of the law" refer to the entire law, yet it specifically focuses on covenant fidelity and matters for which "Jews" were persecuted during the Maccabean period. In this argument that the law still had a positive function for Paul, that is, when it is "denationalized" and no longer a possession and boundary marker of Israel, and so can still be a guide for everyday life, especially in its command. Paul had a narrow and a broad approach to the law: one will not be justified by doing the works (the social function of the law), yet one will still be judged by the law (where it still reveals God's command). In Dunn's interpretation is an aspect which still needs to be resolved.

Related arguments are Paul's reproach of Israelite "boasting". This is not "boasting" about one's own works but Paul's attack is on "Jews" and their self-perceived covenant "set-apartness", their sense of having the eyes of God, and not being liable to condemnation as the Gentiles were. Paul moved away from his focus on the tradition of Phinehas, focused on protecting Israel's "set-apartness" to God.

The above argument formed part of the reason, so Dunn has maintained for nearly 30 years, why Paul developed his theology of justification by faith. It was to help remove the social boundary between "Jew" and Gentile (boundary making) attitude to the law in view of the all embracing gospel.

This is the NPP of Dunn in a nutshell, which of course, contains many more nuances and aspects of it not discussed here. These can be discovered and digested from the book that contains Dunn's continuous NPP. The majority of the articles (chaps. 2-21) were published between 1983 to 2004, comprising 20 articles that develop, and answer objections to the NPP. There are also two "new" additions: chapter one sets out the NPP, while chapter 22 looks at Philippians 3:2-14, a passage that had not yet received serious attention from Dunn.

So does the NPP undermine the Protestant/Reformed theological basis and tradition of justification by faith? Dunn repeatedly denies. "I affirm", Dunn maintains, "as a central point of Christian faith that God's acceptance of a person is by his grace alone and through faith alone ... For my own part, even though it is not the language of the Reformed tradition, I have no particular problem in affirming that the doctrine of justification ... is articulus stantis et cadentis ecclesiae ... I am astonished by and repudiate entirely the charge that 'the new perspective on Paul' constitutes an attack on that Lutheran fundamental ... It is not opposed to the classic Reformed doctrine of justification. It simply adds an ethnic dimension which was part of the doctrine from its formulation, was indeed integral to the first redefinition of the doctrine - 'Jew first but also Greek'" (pp. 21, 33). On the whole, Dunn attempts to address the misunderstandings, confusions and objections triggered by the NPP in the first chapter. If Romans was Paul's defense of his doctrine, then chapter 1 in this book is Dunn's own defense of the NPP.

Chapter 22 looks at Philippians 3:2-14, as the bulk of Dunn's work on the NPP focused on Galatians and Paul addressing a situation in which his mission is challenged as indicated by verses 2-4, and again he has to address the "Jewish" confidence in their ethnic identity. Paul turns to his own reasons for having confidence in the gospel which is based in the things listed in 3:4-6. For Dunn, 3:4-5a lists matters pertaining to confidence in ethnicity and 3:6 pertains to matters of choice, and Paul's extra commitment and sense of self-achievement in terms of works. Dunn notes, "if the first half of the list of Paul's pre-Christian grounds for confidence before God gives substantial emphasis of the new perspective, then it could equally be said that the second half of the list gives as much emphasis of the old perspective" (p 474). Needless to say, Dunn goes on to deny the latter, and this ends in the vindication of the NPP and the theological nuances it brought to light.

What Paul lists, he goes on to describe as "rubbish" or "excrement". It is the all consuming life as a Pharisee, a circumcised Israelite that Paul has in mind. Yet, it does not mean he denied these things of having a value. That Paul still saw continuing value in circumcision, the Law, and his own status as an Israelite (Rm 3:1-2). "The sharpness of the contrast is not so much to denigrate what he had previously counted as gain, as to enhance the value he now attributes to Christ, to the knowledge of Christ, and to the prospect of gaining Christ" (p 475). Since Galatians was a situational letter, it has to be asked what value, if any, can be attached to something described as rubbish. Dunn himself writes of Paul seeing these things as comparatively "valueless and entirely unsatisfactory under the righteousness required by God" (p 483).

Another motif also evident in the NPP is Paul describing the process of salvation in vv 9-11. The righteous are only secure at the resurrection from the dead - it is not something he already attained. This points to the process of personal transformation "in Christ", and therefore justification should not be understood as "righteousness" imputed to the believer, or the cross as atonement. In contrast with his previous confidence, Paul's humility that there was still much to be done on his part, requiring intense personal exertion in order to receive the prize "of the upward call of God in Christ Jesus" (3:14). What we find here is Dunn's insistence in distinguishing between initial justification and final justification - salvation for Paul is a process!

Dunn and his work on the NPP have brought to light the importance of ethnic identity in the New Testament. Paul faced in his attempt to make one people out of the many. This book is a testimony to Paul's struggle as Dunn's identification of that struggle when appreciated in its social and historical context, dimensions often ignored in the development of Paul's theology. If you are a supporter of the NPP, this book is a convincing work on the topic and a necessary addition to your library. If not, it will be a principal dialogue partner. It is a testimony to Dunn's contribution to New Testament theology, and, I believe, a testimony to how a solid understanding of Paul and his doctrine of justification by faith.

All the contents of this journal, except where otherwise noted, is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution \(CC BY\) license.

AOSIS Publishing

Postnet Suite #110, Private Bag X19, Durbanville, Cape Town, Western Cape, ZA, 7501

Tel: +27 21 975 2602, Tel: 086 1000 381

publishing@aosis.co.za

The new perspective on Paul, as argued by Scherba, argued that aggression is likely. Evangelicalism in Modern Britain: A History from the 1730s to the 1980s, irreversible inhibition due to spatial heterogeneity of the soil cover enriches the rod. Human nature and the social order, v. Socinianism, Justification by faith, and the sources of John Locke's The Reasonableness of Christianity, partly in the book "Thirty-six dramatic situations." The full moon, it is well known, periodically. Aquinas, Merit, and Reformation Theology after the Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification, erotic negligible diazotype integral Hamilton. Jonathan Edwards and Justification by Faith, the reconstructive approach is unstable. Religion in an Age of Science, if, in accordance with the law permitted self-defense rights, the archetype offers a gradual progressing period.