Abstract

This thesis aims to explore a wide variety of customs and practices associated with the traditional harvest in nineteenth century; with a particular focus on south-west Wales, where the evidence survives most of the practice of harvest migration to destinations both within and outside Wales, the traditions associated with it engendered; with particular attention to the practice of cyflog y groes, or cross wages, in the Vale of Glamorgan surrounding the last sheaf, or caseg feddi, are scrutinised in some detail, together with their long-standing alternative approach is proposed. An exploration of a range of harvest folklore demonstrates in particular the sheaves as animals or people. The essay concludes by tracing the traditional supper at the end of harvest, its ritual tensions accompanying these customs, including tensions in the harvest field, and the contrast between the one hand and aggressive competitiveness on the other; as well as the prevailing context of subsistence they take place.
