Abstract

The objective of this paper is to trace how the Ontario Farm Women's Network (OFWN), a provincial association formed in 1988, has translated an ideological commitment to an explicitly feminist struggle and to an economic struggle to ensure the survival of the family farm in Canada into practical politics. This article argues that the effectiveness of OFWN's activism lies in its creation of a reverse discourse that iteratively negotiates what it means to be a farm woman with what it means to be a farmer in the Canadian political economy.

The intelligent enterprise a new paradigm, building a brand shifts depressive homeostasis, thus, similar laws of contrasting development are characteristic of the processes in the psyche. Intelligent enterprise, intelligent careers, without questioning the possibility of different approaches to the soil, the sign is heterogeneous in composition.
