The development of interest in the problem of post-war reconstruction has a history of its own, intimately bound up with the Cold War and its impact on the historiography of modern Europe. This becomes clear once we recognize that before the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989, the central problematic of this volume—the reconstruction effort that reshaped Europe in the years 1945–48—did not much figure in Cold War historiography. Insofar as it did, it was under two distinct rubrics.

One, the dominant one, centred upon what were already by the early 1960s the key questions: when did the Cold War start, and who started it? Charting the breakdown of Big Three understanding meant taking a position on whether the rift began in 1943, or 1945, or as late as 1947 or 1948—an issue of much more than mere academic importance for those concerned...
