Abstract

While focusing on civil rights activities in Atlanta, Birmingham, Chicago, and the state of Mississippi, the book draws attention to less well-known sites in Georgia, and Columbia, South Carolina, where radio also played a significant role. Civil rights leaders like Martin Luther King and organizations such as the Southern Christian Leadership Conference placed a premium on access to the radio, often finding it far more effective than other forms of communication in advancing their cause. The book also documents how civil rights activists influenced white opinions on racial matters in the South and beyond. The radio industry itself became the site of a protracted battle for black economic empowerment and a lucrative black consumer market. In addition, Ward rescues from history many colorful deejays, announcers, station managers, executives, and employees who made significant contributions to the freedom struggle through their work on the air.
