Abstract

In the context of the second Gulf war and US and the British c 'old' debates about the category 'woman' have assumed a new paper revisits debates on intersectionality in order to show th on how we might approach some current issues. It first discus contestations among feminists involved in anti-slavery struggl women's suffrage. The second part of the paper uses autobiog studies to demonstrate that social class (and its intersections v sexuality) are simultaneously subjective, structural and about everyday practices. It argues that studying these intersections and dynamic understanding than a focus on social class alone paper considers the potential contributions to intersectional a political approaches such as those associated with post-struct feminist analysis, and diaspora studies.
