A taste for pop: pop art, gender, and consumer culture

Author(s) : Whiting, C.

Author Affiliation : Department of Art History, University of California, Los Angeles, USA.

Book : A taste for pop: pop art, gender, and consumer culture. 1997 pp.xii + 304 of

Abstract : Rather than examining whether pop-art stooped to the level of resources in using Campbell soup cans or comic-book scenes of teenage romances, turned such images of consumer culture into high art, the book declares that these are fundamentally irresolvable and presents four case studies that focus on artists. The artists are: Tom Wesselmann, Roy Lichtenstein, Andy Warhol, a Escobar, and are all closely associated with the pop-art movement. Gender of their cultural manoeuverings are unravelled, noting how the connotation as attached to the seriousness of high art, and the presumed frivolity and c feminine world of consumption repositioned cultural frontiers and reformula relation between sexes.
