Abstract:

During Reconstruction, which is often called the most progressive period in American history, African American strides. By 1868 African American men constituted a majority of registered voters in South Carolina and Mississippi. By 1870 eighty-five percent of Mississippi's black jurors could read and write. However, Reconstruction was followed by a century of Jim Crow laws, lynching, disenfranchisement, sharecropping, unequal educational resources, caricatures, and convict leasing, the Civil Rights Revolution finally ended that period of despair, but the era of Reconstruction can be understood as a reaction to the Civil Rights Movement. This article attempts to understand the persistence of racial inequality in the United States from slavery's end until the present.
