Black lesbian women experience a triple threat based on three identity – race, gender, and sexual orientation – places them on the totem pole of U.S. social hierarchy. With this in mind, the purpose of this project is to explore how Black lesbian student-athletes negotiate three competing identities – race, sexual orientation, and being a female NCAA Division I athlete. I conducted semi-structured interviews in order to provide these student-athletes a voice and express their individual experiences. Since obtaining participants that met the criteria, I have included my findings in order to tell my journey of researching a population I identify myself as. I am forced to the margins of society along with the black community.
