Abstract

Through a systematic analysis of the behavior of second-position clitics in Czech, this paper addresses issues that are also of interest in the general study of cliticization. It is argued that clitic placement in Czech is a syntactic process conditioned prosodically; the host is defined syntactically but must also contain a phonological word. There is also a discrepancy in the orientation of the syntactic vs. phonological host: these clitics are syntactically enclitic but phonologically uncommitted. A crucial role in explaining the alternative patterns of phonological attachment is attributed to discourse factors. It follows that the relationship between syntactic and phonological considerations in clitic placement is more complex than just a matter of determining unambiguous enclisis vs. proclisis.

I have benefitted greatly from discussions with Larry Hyman, Sharon Inkelas, Alan Timberlake, and Gary Holland, and from their invaluable comments on various drafts of this paper. I also want to thank Sam Mchombo and Gene Buckley for their helpful suggestions. A part of an early version of this paper was presented at the Workshop on Clitics during the 1991 Linguistic Institute.
