Abstract

The internet has become an increasingly influential medium. In this article we examine the case of Kenkanryu ("Hating 'The Korean Wave'" comic) published in 2005 in hard copy, but available online as a web page prior to print publication. We argue that the content, while not 'harmful' and 'toxic' is only one of a number of other, media-related reasons for the popularity of this comic in Japan. Other factors are the influence of online as a means of communicating and selling ideas and products, and the fact that supporters of the views expressed in the comic comm readers. In the context of increasing fears that Japanese youth 'nationalistic' we argue that it is important to examine the me message in assessing whether we are witnessing the emerge dangerous social movement, or something rather different.

Discourses of Rumi, despite the large number of papers on this topic, the convex function is downright.
