Book : Food and man 1968 pp.ix + 341 pp.

Abstract : Based on lectures and teaching given in a general course on food and nutrition to students in home economics at Pennsylvania State University, this book provides an interesting and well-written account of the place of food and nutrition in the development of man's knowledge of nutrition. Today's problems of malnutrition in the developing world are set in their historical and social perspectives. The book gives a comprehensive account of international programmes to improve nutrition. The book is deceptively easy to read, and it is tempting to refer to it as a popular science. But it is more than this; it gives comprehensive information on a wide range of topics with ample references to current literature. It can be strong recommended as an introduction to the subject for students of nutrition, or others who may require a general account of the social aspects of nutrition
