If there is some degree of consensus today that bioethics comprises a discipline, a profession, as well as a social movement, there remains a good deal of uncertainty whether bioethics contains distinct epistemological underpinnings in different parts of the world. Commentators sometimes levy the charge that the story of the 'birth of bioethics' is overly Americanised and that the field's approaches to thinking through medical and scientific issues reflect a bias geared towards 'American' values such as individualistic autonomy and personal liberty, and 'American' bioethical frameworks such as principlism. This is a contestable and provocative charge, but has some resonance with bioethics scholars outside the USA. If this is so, are there alternative approaches stemming from different regions such as Europe, and what might those alternative (regional) approaches look like?
